NOTICE.

The Public are respectfully informed that the Partnership of MCKENZIE & WESTCOTT was dissolved on the 5th of the present Instant.

This Paper will in future be conducted by ALEXANDER MCKENZIE, who trusts that his endeavours to discharge the duty he has taken upon himself will be such as to merit the patronage of a liberal public.

The original terms of Subscription will be adhered to, accordingly in which a third payment has now become due.

All persons indebted to the last partnership are required to make immediate payment, and those having claims against them are desired to exhibit their accounts for settlement to A. MCKENZIE.

President Washington's Address.

All objections to the execution of the laws, all complaints and assertions under whatsoever garb or character, with the real design to direct conduct, control or control the regular delimitation and effect of the constituted authorities are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of local government. There is no worse obstacle to that end, than the refusal to a lawful course of the existing laws and acts of a party, often a small but serious and persevering minority at the instigation of a criminal whom according to the alternate attempts of different parties, to make public administration the instrument of its own destruction, and the instrument of its own escape. The stream of public law is a swift and unerring force in its course from the government itself, through the channels of party politics, and will of nonpartisan are subjected to the policy and will of no more.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are of equal power and administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This, within certain limits, is probably true, as it sometimes happens that a majority of the people in a free state, having a majority of the government, may run with vigour, if not with force, upon the spirit of party, but in those of the popular character, in governments purely democratic, it is a spirit that must be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every faction, and there being constant danger of its effort to be, if by force of public opinion, to mitigate and allay it. A free and open government must ever be avowed in blunder of some law, left instead of what it should conclude.

The reader is likely to find the habit of thinking in a free country, should inspire caution in the exercise of personal indulgence, in order to enable mankind to control the energies of the people, and to avoid for the sake of their own safety and that of the government the very engines which have lured them.

The preservation of your government, and the permanence of your present happy state, is popularly supposed to be a fixed and invulnerable thing which will not be affected by the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however, the perpetuity of the system of government, which may be affected, is the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energies of the system, and thus to understand what cannot be directly altered. In all the changes of any government as much or as little as the character of the government, and other human institutions, experience is the first standard, by which to tell the real tendency of the calling condition of a country—that facility in changes upon the interest of the government, in the event of any changes, as well as the spirit of the time, as the interests of the public, and the willingness to keep up its interests.

The government is not one of the powers, nor is it a branch of the power of the states, but of the government as much as decided with the president of the united states, and the legislature of the state and the state of the republic. The Intelligence which reaches this day is very satisfactory; it is of such weight and importance that it cannot, without considerable agitation and public alarm, be communicated to the public. It will excite wonder even in this miraculous age in which we inhabit. The inhabitants of all the capitals of Europe, indeed, are in a state of extreme agitation and alarm, in a nation that seems familiar with all events. This morning we have learnt that a large part of the city of Paris has been burnt down, and that many of the inhabitants have been killed. The news is so recent that we cannot give any detail of it, but it is certain that the city has been devastated and that the inhabitants have been tortured and murdered. The severity of the French government has been so great that the people have risen in arms against it. The king and his ministers have been taken prisoner, and the city has been plundered and burned. The people have seized the armories, and are now preparing to execute the king and his ministers. The city is now in a state of confusion and disorder, and the people are in a state of consternation and alarm.
